Join the Community Arts Caucus on our 2018 tour at one of Seattle's youth-based community arts organizations. Established in 1986, Coyote Central is a nonprofit that uses the arts to challenge and empower young adolescents of every racial and socio-economic background through building skills, creative thinking, self-awareness, and social awareness. Using hands-on projects taught by professionals in their creative fields, Coyote Central strives to create safe spaces for young people to take risks without worrying about failure or conformity. In this atmosphere, adolescents develop their own artistic voices, creating work that empowers them to imagine a world in which they want to live and to realize their potential to make that change happen. While at Coyote Central, attendees will engage in a tour and creative workshop that will provide pedagogical tools used by local teaching artists and educators in Seattle to encourage young adolescents to become creative problem-solvers who are confident in their identity and capabilities, and who are engaged in their communities.

Venue: Chihuly Garden and Glass

Onsite: 12:30 – 2:00 pm (90 minutes)

Group departs at 12:00 noon—Returns approximately 2:30 pm

Since Seattle hosted the World's Fair in 1962, the Seattle Center has remained an integral part of the local community. The iconic Space Needle is an important reminder of the dreams of that time. Owned and managed by the Wright family (children of Howard S. Wright II, who constructed it), the Space Needle continues to be an icon for innovation, originality, and imagining the future. When the opportunity to reinvigorate Seattle Center arose, the Wright family took interest. They invited Northwest artist Dale Chihuly to present a comprehensive collection of his work. Having always loved the Space Needle, Chihuly was delighted with the opportunity to design an Exhibition Hall, a Garden installation, and a Glasshouse in his own community. Through its community partners, Chihuly Garden and Glass supports opportunities for education and involvement in the arts. On this tour, participants will explore Chihuly Garden and Glass and participate in a guided tour utilizing curriculum developed by Seattle Public Schools and CGG about the science of glass.
